What a charming, delightful story. The first two months of 2017 were barren for me, didn't start/finish many really good books, started a few that went into the donation bag, so reading this book was a breath of fresh air, something to pull me out of my reading slump. Of course I read the 4th books instead of starting at the beginning but if the first 3 books are anywhere near as delightful as this one I will be very happy. I loved every character in the book, the time the H/H were in Venice was especially magical - Venice has always been a bucket-list destination for me. The story itself was believable, and the author - thank you sooo much - didn't resort to cliché actions and reactions by either main character. I loved this book!

4th book in this series but probably my least favorite.

content: sex is implied throughout but no scenes, all closed door.

It all starts with a missed bus, sore feet, not enough money for a taxi and a snow storm. Sophie's night just can't seem to get any worse. She decided to turn around and go back to the hotel for a bit to stay warm until the next bus should be running by. She is so used to being unseen as a waitress at parties but that is all about to be changed.

She is watching her feet and focusing on getting to the warmth of the hotel that she misses one big thing or should I say a tall man. She runs right into Marco Santoro. He catches her before she falls into the snow. A night together leaves an impression on him more than it should have.

A couple weeks later they run into each other at a New Year's ball. Marco decides that he needs a distraction when he is going home to Venice. But when she comes, she faces his mother and his sister. Both are wondering if she might be the one for him. But when she goes, all they know is there is an attraction between them and their names. So much left unspoken and so much to learn. But can a man scared to love, fall in love? Can a woman who struggled so much for independence, learn that she can be both independent and allow someone to help her? Most importantly can these two strong willed people come together on the same page before their baby is born?
