I read this when it was first published years and years ago. I remember I thoroughly enjoyed it and couldn't wait for the movie...

Shauli Chaudhuri says

John Grisham is clearly a "brand" that is my favorite and I own all of his books that I've read. So my review is bound to be biased. I say brand (and not author) because to me John Grisham is a brand in crime fiction just as Xerox is a brand in photocopiers. The David Baldaccis of the world can't hold a candle to him. Maybe some of John Lescroart's works are close enough. There are readers who say they liked only some of the books like "The Firm" or "A Time to Kill" or "A Pelican Brief," but I wonder if the bias is because these books were also transformed into excellent movie scripts. And then there are readers who don't like him just because of his political leaning. But when it comes to books like crime fiction and John Grisham, you should forget about politics and whether they became movie scripts. Its about entertainment; the fast pace, the legal intrigue and courtroom drama in the fight of justice over injustice. Its about the realism that only Grisham can bring to his writing because of his experiences as a lawyer.

Chris Hickie says

I was in high school when John Grisham really hit the scene (mid 90's) and I devoured his books. I distinctly remember reading The Firm and just being floored by thec depth and pace of his writing. These books will each stand the test of time and be relevant 50 years from now.
