Vanessa Kings says

“The Descent into the Maelstrom” is book four on the Phantom of the Earth series, I must say that I never read a science-fiction series longer than 3 books, and I thought I was going to get bored with so many books, especially when I saw this book’s length; it’s significantly longer than the other three.

To my surprise, I finished it on record time; it’s just too full of action to get bored at all. The fourth book of the series is so far my favorite, because it focuses on two young characters and how they grow or develop into adults on such a short amount of time.

I loved the author’s ability to deliver emotions and different moods through words and how the different points of view came together to create a very complex plot that will keep you wondering how will everything get to a happy ending on the fifth and last book.

This is a great continuation of the series. Watching Oriana and Pasha grow into adults and their destinies is fascinating. The interaction of Gwen and Anatosha is very interesting. They all grow up so fast that they don’t always have time to grow up emotionally.

Cliffhanger ridden never ending story. Lots of filler. Too expensive for me.

I have been forced to downgrade my rating on this entire series, not because the writing is poor, it is actually very good, but because the author cannot seem to complete a story. After reading four books, that were advertised as being quite large, I find that I seem to be less than half way through. The author claims that she thought long and hard on whether to include a huge amount of appendix information in each book. From my point of view she made the wrong choice. Nearly a third of each book is tied up with this filler. Despite the very good writing, despite the memorable characters, involved plot, and the exquisite world building, I have had enough. I am through with this series, and quite likely through with this author. I have no difficulty sticking with an author through an epic tale, I am a big fan of the "Ender's series", Joseph Lallo's "Delver series" or Maggie Stiefwater's "Raven boys series" are among my favorites. The difference is in the selling. Each of the series that I love tells complete stories, that are connected, not one long continuing story separated by cliffhangers. I feel cheated and robbed. Zen will get not one more red cent d me.

The Descent into the Maelstrom is Book 4 in the Phantom of the Earth series. The Barao twins, Oriana and Pasha are sent for development which happens at a very accelerated pace to prepare them for the Harpoons which is a combination of tests based on mental and physical capabilities that will allow them to be bid on by the Beimeni citizens in hopes to be placed in the highest capacity. The children have learned very little of their parents, who they were and what they did but discover a few details, their mother is dead and their father is up for his murder trial and sentencing. Antosha is running a campaign and Gwen is overseeing his rise to the top overcoming any obstacle. Connor is reunited with his father, the Liberations leader, and he begins to teach his son about his abilities and heritage. They set off together to confront their enemies in hopes to bring Beimeni society back to what it once stood for. The storyline took a turn here focusing on the children, their schooling and their battle to the top. The acceleration of their growth was unbelievable and appeared added to hurry the story along. It became yet another story about a young female protagonist who tries to prove her worth.
