To the Stoning: Leftist Erotica Patrik Sampler

To the Stoning: Leftist Erotica is a collection of ten short stories that alternate between mystic surrealism and caustic satire. In a variety of settings – Canada, Russia, Kazakhstan, and Japan – we find societies dominated by hysterical alarmism, in which permissiveness coexists with totalitarian control and characters respond to mundane problems with bizarre and fully unsuited solutions. A man visits a foreign country, spits gum into a river, and imagines himself implicated in a diplomatic row. The Prime Minister of Canada invokes religious freedom to bring back the death penalty. Exhibitionists flash genitals with impunity, while unwitting bystanders are accused of voyeurism. In these stories, Patrik Sampler creates a sparsely painted world of absurdity and paranoia, nevertheless dream-like, and occasionally imbued with human feeling.

A collection of short simple stories that takes you to different places. Easy to read but it can get a little confusing at times.

My rating is 2.5 stars.

Sex and sarcastic stories, but not showing the content too explicit. Some brilliant ideas can be found here. The stories are well written and the main character has strong personality. The author took us to face many cultures, places, and minds. Sometimes the stories shows unconnected events and made me felt confused. It's hard to stuck in this book for long time without distraction because I felt bored for many points because these short stories can't give pleasure for strong adventure. The characters in this book are named with initials and sometimes I forget them easily after I moved to other chapters. No typos can be found as I said before, well written.

I gave 3 stars for this book. I would like to recommend this book to people (especially adult) who like not-so-complicated-contemporary-stories.
